From my new vantage ground I could see the German dragoons hurling themselves forward along the road between Diest and Haelen in what proved to be the supreme effort of the day. They did not go far.

At the entrance to the village of Zelek-Haelen a barricade had been constructed across the road. A cyclist corps with machine guns lay in wait behind this and were distributed in several houses and in the church tower awaiting the attack. When the lancers came within 300 yards, as near as I could judge, from those who lay in ambush the automatic guns burst into song, the hallstorm of builets cutting down the attacking squadron like so much grain. Of the entire squadron but two poor riderless horses succeeded in reaching and jumping the barriers.
